sessor Extraordinary of his Board of Mines, may help to unravel it. To carry on the feelings of childhood wender and novelty with the appearances which every day, for perhaps forty years, had rendered familiar, this is the character and privilege of genius and the marks which distinguish genius from talents." This must explain to some extent the prophetic states of Swedenborg. There is no proof that he ever claimed miraculous power though many of his most implicit followers give him credit for its possession: the testimonies relied upon, however, have been sought by others rather than put forward by himself. Many of them are curious, but have no philosophical interest. His 'system of correspondences,' in which his peculiar merit is supposed to lie, is confessedly not original, the fathers of the Church and the mystics of all ages having insisted on similar relations between the material and the

The scientific works of Swedenberg, however, are of a most remarkable character. Upon Anatomy, Chemistry, Mechanics and all the branches of Natural Philosophy he has written many and most valuable treatises. The character of his mind was eminently analytical, and is all his examinations he displayed the most patient and accurate research.-He never allowed, as is often the case with scientific speculatists, particular facts to lose their individuality in the glare of some cellipsing theory; the smallest points are treated with the most careful attention, and his highest abstructions are ever allied to practical facts. One feature of his scientage of the scientage are ever allied to practical facts. One feature of his scie tific career is worthy of special note. The spirit of modern science dwells continually in its own proximate inductions it rests content with the discoveries it has made, seeking no higher, more ultimate truths, and even treating its own first principles as absurd and visionary. Nothing can be more opposed to this than the course of Swedenborg. For twentyfive years he devoted himself wholly to the investigation of end the highest spiritual truths at which he aimed. And yet there is no discursiveness, no anticipations of succeeding steps, but a steady and close adherence to the matter and argument of his several treatises. His constant effort was to look through the natural and interpret thereby the spiritand and invisible. He saw and showed the connexion between nature and the affections of the soul. "Especially, says Emerson, 'did his shade-loving muse hover over and interpret the lower parts of nature: he showed the mysteri ous bond that allies moral evil to the foul material forms, and has given in epical parastes a theory of insanity, of beasts of unclean and fearful things.

Whatever may be the result of the efforts to extend the church of which Swedenborg is the Mahomet, it seems impossible that his vast literary and scientific productions houll much longer rest se eath the injustice and contemp which have thus far be a their portion. Their merit canno be questioned; and the strong, sound judgement which he manifested in discussing matters of finance and other subjects connected with his fficial station, should afford at least jects connected with his sincial station, should affect at least presumptive evidence that they are worthy special attention.
